Caroline Hemenway Harman, a "relatively unknown woman" who died in 1940, was the center of praise and admiration Tuesday as LDS Church dignitaries officially placed her name on the new facility which will house the Brigham Young University Division of Continuing Education.

"Aunt Carrie" Harman was the step-mother of L.W. "Pete" Harman, co-founder of the Kentucky Fried Chicken franchise system. She adopted the boy after his mother died a few hours after giving birth to him. The restaurateur and other members of the Harman family were chief donors for the Continuing Education Building.

The BYU Conference Center, which adjoins the Harman Building, was also dedicated during the ceremonies.

Before leaving the dedication, Presi significant achievement in science or in any other education-related field," Hinckley said.

"This building is dedicated to a woman who was not concerned with rights, but with responsibility," he added.

Hinckley said the university's board of trustees was pleased to honor on the BYU campus a woman "who was the epitome of selflessness and service."

Henry B. Eyring, church commissioner of education, said the building, which will serve as the administrative center for the nation's largest continuing education program, will be a "window to and for the university."

He said BYU has two big advantages over other universities. The first is the establishment of high standards, and the second is the attitude inherited from pioneers.

Pete Harman told the overflow crowd that the dream and reality of the building "began high in the clouds." He said he sat next to
